Car pollution

Sarah: Good morning Wentworth, have you noticed the sky today?

W: Good morning Sarah. Yes I have. I'm not surprised. Paris is regularly covered in a health-threatening yellow-grey pall on windless days. Did you come by bus today?

Sarah: Yes I did. The authorities have no choice but to impose driving restrictions to help clear the air when pollution levels peak and I think it's a good step. I wonder just how they can measure if drivers are following this rule.

W: To be honest I don't know. Another solution would be to allow drivers to enter the city only on alternate days. Anyway, the time will come when traffic will have to be banned from cities altogether.

Sarah: In order this solution could work, more efficient public transport and car sharing would greatly reduce car pollution in cities.

W: Yes and why not systematically suspend all fares on public transport when the air really becomes unbreathable?

Sarah: This sounds a bit utopic but if we don't want to choke to death in the future, we will probably have to give up all non-essential car trips.
